Paschal Beverly Randolph

The cover of this issue of ACSQ features the gilt-stamped decoration on the cover of Paschal Beverly Randolph’s book Eulis!: The History of Love. Randolph’s emblem of a winged globe represents the soul. The admonition “TRY!” encouraged spiritual seekers toward clairvoyance, or personal unity with, and experience of, his conceived “soul world.” Randolph’s writings influenced Madame Blavatsky and the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor, and form the foundation of late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century occultism. Hamilton College recently added a number of titles by Randolph to the Communal Societies Collection.

Paschal Beverly Randolph (1825-1875) was born in New York City to mixed-race parents. After a rough childhood in the notorious Five Points neighborhood he worked as a sailor and barber. After he returned to the United States in 1855, he lived in the Upstate New York town of Stockbridge on land owned by abolitionist Gerrit Smith, and then in Utica. Randolph married an African-American woman with whom he had three children.

In the late 1850s and early 1860s he traveled to Europe and the Near East where he made contact with many in the Spiritualist movement, as well as practical occultists. Returning to the United States he founded the first Rosicrucian Order in the western hemisphere, the Fraternitas Rosae Crucis. Randolph was a trance medium. He also taught what he termed “sex magic,” sold medical elixirs containing hashish, and magic mirrors used in occult practices.

Randolph married a second time to an Irish woman named Kate Corson Randolph. He published numerous books before his untimely death at the age of forty-nine in Toledo, Ohio. John Patrick Deveney’s definitive biography Paschal Beverly Randolph: A Nineteenth-Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian, and Sex Magician (SUNY Press, 1997) is highly recommended. Hamilton College holds nine of Randolph’s works.
